~~I was having a meeting of the minds with my editors this summer, and the topic of our editing system came up as an area for potential revision.~~ In the past, we used a pretty complicated solution to work around a pretty simple problem: Google documents were built to collaboratively edit documents, but we needed to make edits -- that all editors could see -- and have one person (the writer) change them. We summarized the system a while ago on the site.

So you can imagine how surprised and delighted I was when one of my editors suggested that we scrap all of that for Google Drive's new "Suggesting Mode," one of the changes made in the latest update.

For those familiar with Microsoft Word's track changes function, it's basically the same thing. If a collaborator deletes a line of text in suggesting mode, Google strikes through the text then gives the owner the option to approve the edit, disapprove the edit, or comment on it.
